Done.....0549> 2.4. Delayed Habituation of Startle Reflex After Prenatal Stress {#sec2dot4-ijerph-16-02816}

----- The session started at 09:30 a.m. (i.e., 90 min. after the completion of Experiment 1), and the EEG electrodes were not removed from the head. We did not apply maternal separation and exposed the rat pup's mother to the EEG during the testing session. The startled response was recorded for 5 min using a startle reflex apparatus (O'Toole & Tsai, 1983; O'Toole & Bernacchi, 1986) with 40 ms-duration startle pulses delivered to the middle of the dorsal surface of the animal's head. The startle response was recorded in the absence of auditory stimuli. In each session, there was a random inter-trial interval of 20--50 s. The magnitude of startle response to each startle pulse was expressed as the peak-startle amplitude (peak startle amplitude = maximum amplitude after 40 ms minus a baseline amplitude, which was computed as the average of amplitudes during 10--30 ms after the startle pulse). The magnitude of startle response was averaged within each session. The mean overall startle response during the 5-min session was evaluated. The startle response showed a trend toward habituation across days, with a significant reduction in the magnitude of startle response by the second day of testing [$F(4, 64) = 3.75, *p < .05$].
