Q: Problems setting up TensorFlow with GPU on Windows 10 From what I've been able to find, the only way to use TensorFlow on GPU on Windows is through a docker container. I followed the guide from and I got a container up and running. But I cannot seem to find any performance increase over a non-GPU machine. The GPU is attached to a GTX 1070.

A: The short answer is that I am not seeing a performance increase because I am not using the GPU. According to the guide I linked to, To use the GPU in Windows, you can create a Python 2.7 container and install the TensorFlow Eager interpreter with the `gpu-eager` flag. So it seems there is no way to use TensorFlow with GPU on Windows without using a docker container.

Q: How to make TextBlock display multiple lines but only when it is "full"? I am currently writing a C# WPF application. I have a TextBlock that is placed in a GroupBox. The user enters several words in the TextBlock, and presses a "send" button to send the entered words to a server. The challenge I have is that I wish the user to be able to enter several words in the TextBox and have them all displayed. The problem is that the user can also enter a lot of useless characters in the TextBlock, and fill it with junk. The TextBlock's width is limited to the width of the GroupBox. I am therefore looking for a way to format the TextBlock so that the TextBlock displays the entered text (several lines but only when the text is "full"). Are there any ways to accomplish this, without having to resort to Javascript? A: Use a multiline TextBox. Add the following to your XAML:

Ask HN: What HTML5 Web Framework Do You Use? - sdesol

It looks like all major browsers have adopted the same HTML5 standard. I've heard people talk about Angular, Knockout and React for a while and they even have an LESS framework. From experience with all of these frameworks, I feel like I could get the job done and learn some things in the process. After reading the HTML5 spec and playing with all the frameworks mentioned above, I'm just not sure which one to start with. I know Angular is built on top of the DOM and Knockout is
